I. Introduction

In March/April 1987, the Expert Group on External Sector Transactions concluded that, in view of the large and rapidly growing international transactions in services, it would be necessary to improve the measurement of those transactions. The Group concluded, furthermore, that for national accounts purposes the "details for ...services should be the details that are needed for [the accounts'] internal consistency." ^{1/} In addition, the Group agreed that "a standard list of services items should be used as the basis for a harmonized presentation," ^{2/} i.e., a presentation that could be used for classifying services both in national accounts and balance of payments statistics. Such a list should include "the traditional items shown under services--transport, travel, etc.--and also those items that are becoming increasingly important as international transactions, such as financial services and communications." ^{2/} Recognizing the need for additional details, the Group felt that "[these] details should agree with the Central Product Classification (CPC), preferably at a high level of that hierarchy," ^{2/} but also that "those concerned with the CPC should pay particular attention to the needs of the balance of payments and external sector accounts, so that harmonization between these accounts and other accounts, including input-output, be attainable." ^{2/}

One major concern that surfaced in the expert group meeting on external sector transactions is whether the balance of payments statement is the appropriate vehicle for presenting the detailed data on international trade in services. As precise details of commodity trade are not contained in balance of payments statements but are to be found in external trade statistical publications, many balance of payments statisticians would argue that detailed statistics on services are best handled in the form of supplementary details or as satellite accounts rather than constitute an integral part of the balance of payments statement. In addition, the problems of global asymmetry in current account transactions would tend to increase rather than diminish if additional burdens were placed on compilers, particularly in an environment of budgetary constraints facing national statistical offices. Furthermore, the possibility of obtaining additional details on services from many developing countries is rather problematical given their limited statistical capabilities. On the other hand, this area is of particular interest for policy makers in general, and to the Fund in particular, because of the importance of the services sector in the analysis of balance of payments statistics and the Fund's jurisdiction over restrictions on current payments, including services. As an expression of that interest, Fund staff recently provided information on statistical and analytical aspects of services, and the Director of the Fund's Bureau of Statistics recently made a presentation to the GATT Group on Negotiations of Services. The OECD initiative in the area of financial services is a further indication of the growing interest in that segment of services.

The following draft classification for international transactions in services reflects the Group's conclusions against the background of the draft CPC, of which the part covering services is given in its entirety in Appendix 1 and of which the divisions and groups covering services are listed in Appendices 2 and 3, respectively.

II. The Proposed Draft Classification for International Transactions in Services

With respect to the draft classification of international transactions in services, the following points should be noted:

1. The draft covers all service components of the existing classifications in A System of National Accounts and the Balance of Payments Manual;
2. The draft does not cover, however, (a) freight and insurance and (b) retail sale and wholesale trade services on exports within the border of the exporting country. These are covered in the merchandise component of the SNA and the Manual and in the services categories of the CPC;
3. Except for Group 85, Transport, Storage, and Communication Services, the draft does not show separately any of the CPC's classes and subclasses;
4. The draft does not separately cover an item for travel. The introduction of that item would require that for the majority of the CPC sections, divisions, groups, and classes, including the sections covering merchandise, a distinction would have to be made between transactions of travelers and transactions of entities other than travelers; and
5. The draft does not make any distinction between transactions of official entities and transactions of entities other than official entities. The introduction of that SNA and Manual distinction would require that such a distinction would have to be made for several CPC divisions and groups as well.

III. Points for Discussion

The proposed draft classification follows the Central Product Classification at a high level of that hierarchy while providing the details that are necessary for national accounts and balance of payments purposes. The compilers may wish to discuss whether the proposed draft can serve as a point of departure for the classification of services in the external transactions account of the SNA and the Manual.
